

It is to be expected when adventuring in the northwestern reaches that one will encounter a Slime Trancer at some point. These slime molds, growing as large as buildings, are the sorts of ascensions that result when computronium saturates the landscape as it has in so much of that part of the world. They have adapted well to wandering explorers and would-be heroes, such that many can form the vague shapes of humans inside their mass, luring the unaware close enough to inhale their spores which spray in a cloud about them.

The exact mechanism is unknown, but once inhaled, these spores cause an unnatural and overriding compulsion to enter the plasmoid mass of the Slime Trancer.

Slime Trancers with as many as twenty squirming people inside have been found in the wild, supplied enough oxygen to survive while they are digested alive. It is a terrible fate, and entirely unnecessary if these rushing adventurers would only read a book or two before stepping into dangerous places!